The use of bioprinting technology has made it possible to generate cellular structures with multiple growth factors, including micro-carriers, cells, and biomaterials, at high cellular densities. Protein production has been used to construct models of biological, anatomical, or mechanical structures. However, it is still relatively difficult to obtain high-density protein-secreting cells, because the volume of the printed constructs is usually small and the printing process involves many steps. An alternative strategy would be to co-print protein-secreting cells on the growing structures. This strategy for growing cells and protein production would be a highly versatile tool for the fabrication of artificial organs, including those for ocular, cardiovascular, and neural systems. In this study, we showed that a co-printed protein-secreting cell suspension can induce the formation of a 3D scaffold composed of human fibroblast cells. This scaffold then acts as a template for the subsequent formation of a mixture of human fibroblast cells and mouse muscle cells. Our results suggest that co-printed cells could be used to directly reconstitute complex structures, including those for bioprinting, for tissue engineering, and for drug screening in vitro, by combining them with bioink and different types of cell-laden scaffolds.Philip E.
